Occupational health and safety risks

- A proper health and safety programme has to be implemented and maintained, on an ongoing base.
- Baseline conditions for heat, particulates and noise need to be established after installation of the plant.
- These parameters should be monitored against local safety regulations and, in the absence of the latter, against OSHA standards.
- A training programme for workers should also be part of the safety strategy.
- The proposed plant should strive to maintain the highest safety and housekeeping standards.
