MEMORANDUM ON THE OBJECTS OF THE ALIENATION OF LAND AMENDMENT BILL, 1998

The purchase of land for residential purposes is one of the basic needs of South Africans and it is necessary that the acquisition of such a basic need does not result in great hardships. South Africa is currently experiencing an unprecedented demand in land ownership, especially for residential purposes. Many people in South Africa, especially those from previously disadvantaged background, are not experienced in property transactions. For instance many purchasers are not aware that a signed offer to purchase is legally binding once the seller accepts it.

The purpose of this Amendment Bill therefore is to confer on certain purchasers (or prospective purchasers) of land the right to revoke an offer to purchase the land or to terminate a deed of alienation in respect of the land. This is commonly referred to as a "cooling-off" right. Such a right is not entirely a novelty in our law. In terms of section 13 of the Credit Agreements Act 75 of 1980 a buyer who signs a credit agreement at a place other than the seller's ordinary place of business may terminate the agreement within five days after the signature thereof provided the transaction was initiated by the seller or his manager, agent or employee. The Consumer Codes of Conduct for Property Time - Sharing, Direct selling, Home Construction by the Business Practices Committee also makes provision for a cooling off period. Under the Australian law all purchasers enjoy a cooling off right except estate agents. This right is therefore under that law not limited to first time home buyers.

The fundamental idea behind a cooling-off clause is to protect persons who buy goods having been influenced to do so by high-pressure selling techniques. There is indication that questionable marketing techniques do exist with regard to property transactions and it is therefore desirable to give purchasers of property the right to cancel a contract where a decision was influenced by questionable marketing techniques.

In addition to the high pressure marketing techniques, it is an inescapable fact that many people make a decision to purchase property on emotional rather than rational grounds. Because the purchase of land is a major decision involving a huge long term financial commitment, a cooling-off right is under the circumstances desirable to give purchasers the further opportunity to carefully and rationally reconsider the transaction and its implication, if necessary, to obtain independent advice as to whether or not they should proceed therewith. Such a major decision if made under pressure or irrationally and which turns out to be wrong cannot be rectified easily and may cause great economic, financial and social hardship such as over indebtedness.

A cooling-off right erodes the common law rule that all contracts validly entered into are enforceable and should be adhered to (pacta sunt servanda). Accordingly it is not in the public interest to introduce a cooling-off right for every person who enters into a deed of alienation. The right should be confined only to persons who are truly in need of statutory protection. For this reason the Amendment Bill does not confer a cooling-off right on sellers of land. A seller, as a general rule, is not acquiring a basic need by entering into a long term financial obligation. He is furthermore not subjected to questionable marketing techniques.

The cooling-off right introduced by the Amendment Bill is furthermore confined to persons who are buying land intended for residential purposes. Persons who buy commercial and industrial properties can reasonably be expected to know what they are doing and/or to obtain independent advice before entering into a property transaction. There is therefore no need to make the cooling-off right available to such persons.

The following comments apply in respect of the specific clauses of the Bill:

Clause 1: Definition of land for the purposes of the cooling-off clause

As stated earlier, the cooling-off right is confined to purchasers who buy land which is used or intended to be used mainly for residential purposes. Persons who buy dwelling houses will therefore enjoy a cooling-off right, as opposed to those who buy commercial, industrial or agricultural properties. Persons who buy housing interests in retirement schemes, or shares in a share block company which owns or leases residential property, sectional titles will also enjoy the cooling-off right.

Clause 2: Contents of contract

It is necessary to entrench the right to cool off in all contracts involving purchase of land for residential purposes so as to make both parties aware of its existence. This is necessary to avoid possible misunderstanding on the part of the seller who might believe that an offer or a deed of alienation is valid and enforceable and that he or she (the seller) can on the strength of it enter into another deed of alienation to buy a property elsewhere. A seller who has signed such other deed of alienation may land in serious difficulties if the purchaser under the first deed of alienation exercises his or her cooling-off right.

Clause 3: The cooling-off clause

Subclause 1: The cooling-off clause applies to all purchasers, except those listed in subsection (5).

Subclause 2: This subclause is self-explanatory.

Subclause 3: The purpose of this clause is to avoid confusion and eliminate disputes as to whether a particular notice qualifies as a notice of revocation or termination for the purposes of subclause (1). The provisions are self-explanatory.

Subclause 4: The effect of this subclause is that all monies received by the seller, an estate agent or an attorney (or any other person) in respect of the offer or sale must be refunded to the purchaser, within the period stated in the clause, if the cooling-off right is exercised.

Subclause 5: This subclause provides for exclusions, ie cases where the cooling-off right would not apply:

- (a) Persons who buy land in the name of a company, close corporations or trusts.
- (b) Arranging a public auction can be an expensive undertaking and the whole object of the auction could be frustrated if the purchaser at an auction later decides to cool-off.

- (c) There is no reason why a purchaser should enjoy multiple opportunities to cool-off in respect of the same property; hence the inclusion of this subparagraph.
- (d) The purpose of this clause is to prevent a situation where a third party (legal persona) uses a natural person as a front to buy land. A deed of alienation can be entered into on the basis that the purchaser has the right to nominate a third party as the purchaser. It is not the intention to confer a cooling-off right on a nominee who is not a natural person, but which may for example be a company or close corporation. The paragraph is also intended to prevent a circumvention of subclause (8) in that it is not the purpose to confer a cooling-off right on a purchaser who uses other persons as fronts to enter into a number of transactions in terms of which they reserve the right to appoint the first purchaser as the true purchaser.

Subclause 6: This clause is self-explanatory.

Subclause 7: This clause is self-explanatory.

Subclause 8: It is not the intention that the cooling-off right be misused by purchasers to stifle competition or to monopolise the market. Unless the cooling-off right is restricted in the manner set out in this subclause, it would be possible for a person to buy all the properties that are for sale in a particular town, knowing that he or she has the right to terminate each of those agreements within five days. By doing so such person can in effect obtain options on all available properties in an area, making it impossible for other purchasers to enter into enforceable sale agreements in respect of such properties before the cooling-off period has expired. This is clearly undesirable.

Subclause 9: The provisions of this clause are self-explanatory.
